FMCSA regulations require alcohol and drug testing of drivers who are required to have a CDL. The regulations include procedures for urine drug testing and breath alcohol testing. A driver must be tested after an accident that resulted in a fatality regardless of fault. Accidents that include bodily injury or a vehicle that needs to be towed require a driver to be tested only if that driver is issued a citation.

Alcohol tests must be taken within two to eight hours after the accident. Drug tests must be taken within 32 hours of the accident. Unless there are extenuating circumstances, a driver must be available for testing, or it might be assumed the driver has refused testing. A refusal is considered the same as a positive test.
